Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the PERPETUA, is one of the best-known and chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translaface then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and tion into metal type of the chiselled lettering in constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation comhad its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid missioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpe-TUA, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's 1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifica-tions and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the bestknown and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculpcharacter and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, tor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own draw-Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of ings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the bestknown and most widely-used of contemporar type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Mono type Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own draw ings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widelyused of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertis-

ments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpe-TUA, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of THE FLEURON in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the bestknown and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc.

abcdefghi erpetua

Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was deof the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The

Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own 1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of titlepages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the bestknown and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's

Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-

European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimen tal fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of titlepages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is signed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross'at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross' at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the chiselled lettering in stone which had established Gill's European reputation as a fine creative craftsman before his 'Stations of the Cross'at Westminster Cathedral brought him fame as an artist. The Monotype Corporation commissioned the design from Gill in 1927, and in that year one experimental fount was cut by hand from the sculptor's own drawings. The final version of the face then evolved by subtle modifications and had its first appearance in an inset in Number 7 of the Fleuron in 1930. The italic of Perpetua is full of character and is unusually legible, and constitutes an invaluable aid to the designer of title-pages, jackets, advertisments, etc. Perpetua, is one of the best-known and most widely-used of contemporary type faces. It was designed by the great sculptor Eric Gill (1882-1940), and is in fact a translation into metal type of the